Excerpt: .poets, novelists and other authors, noting the best editions, the best translations, the best histories of the literature, and the books which a librarian could most wisely recommend to one reading with a view to acquire or keep up a language. In short, the lectures are to teach the librarian how to answer wisely the questions he is likely to be asked in various departments. Avoiding what interests only the specialist, and making prominent what the librarian needs to know, a valuable general view of all the leading departments is given by recognized authorities. 3. Course in Literature. This is closely allied and will include the bibliography of the various literatures discussed. So large a part of the reading in most libraries is in the field of belles-lettres, that a course of over forty lectures by the college professors and other eminent scholars has...
