Excerpt: .But as the light breeze gently stirred the leaves, the hot sun blinked through between them, and the heavy air weighed upon the eyelids. The book was closed, feet were thrust out, and the head rested on the back of the chair, while in the debatable land between sleep and waking, thought floated aimlessly among things present and absent, fact and fancy. Through eyes half-opened, a little toddling figure in white is seen approaching, with blue eyes and rosy cheeks and pouting lips. Won t you please get me some Marguerites? Of course I will, my little one, and off we go hand in hand, among the daisies. Again the border of dreamland is reached, and then a red head ending in a black nose is thrust into my hand, and the owner thereof manifests a tendency to be all over me at once. Down, Rover, lie down! and with a push the affectionate brute, for whose attentions I fear his master is not sufficiently grateful, is induced to stretch himself out at my feet, breathing heavily in the nervous fashion which the distemper has bequeathed to him. Passing along the village street toward the post-office as the day is waning, the reflection from the dry earth makes hotter the hot air. Across the green of the valley the distant hills and mountains rise through the dusty haze, tier beyond tier, clearly marked, like giant wave lines on a mighty sea, disappearing gradually toward the...
