One of these is larger than the rest, and immediately behind it the vault is perforated by a single, excentric, or, rarely, central aperture, which is often prolonged into a tubular proboscis, and which is to be regarded as the anus. In all such cases, the ambulacral grooves are continued beneath the above-mentioned canopy, from the bases of the arms, across the ventral aspect calyx, as so many tunnels. During life these lodged both the l grooves and the water-vessels beneath them, and there is aid that the latter opened into a circular vessel surrounding the and representing the circular ambulacral vessel of the Echino generally. Hence in specimens of such forms, where the armsl been detached (figs. 294-296), the upper side of the calyx is i to be covered with a plated dome, and...
