Reviews

It is one of my personal favorite books. It is written in easy terms and never hard to understand. It has been designed in an exceedingly easy way and it is only after I finished reading this publication that I in fact changed me, change the way I think.

Some, for instance, are constructions, as the sequence of thought in the development of an original discourse. (3) No meaning has a. Quality that is similar to, or identical with, that of any sensation. This is perfectly evident with regard to such abstractions as cause, justice, truth, etc. Neither color nor sound, nor smell nor taste, nor muscular tension, nor cutaneous quality, nor any sensory characteristic can be looked upon as one of the characteristics of meaning. The meanings of cause, justice, truth, etc., are not hot, nor cold, nor tense, nor sweet, etc. Even the meaning of sensation, --as a mental structure that results from the activity of one of the sensory receptors being transmitted to the center--has no sensory quality. No meaning has a quality similar to or identical with that of the sensation. b. Sensory intensity. No meaning has the attribute of intensity in the same sense as the sensations. No meaning has an attribute which has its counterpart in another attribute of an external stimulus, as loudness in the amplitude of the sound waves, pressure in the weight or force of the stimulus, etc. Intensity in this sense is never a characteristic of meaning. The only thing that resembles it might be, for instance, the effect upon one's course of action, of some meaning suddenly dawning on one, as compared with meanings that are more or less indifferent. But the tendency to call forth action is..
